They were recognised for their services to the community. "All private sector-related faculties will benefit from my experience not only in agriculture but also technology, veterinary and business administration," Mr Mulwana said. "We will work together to develop curricula, which suits the needs of the market."

Prof. Luboobi said Makerere has resolved to strengthen training programmes in faculties by involving the participation of professionals from the public and private sectors and creating modalities for joint research between the private sector and the university.

"The theme of the breakfast meeting was tapping synergies of university private sector partnership. We believe that the impact of the partnership is greater than if the two worked separately," Prof. Luboobi said.

Recently, Makerere University signed a memorandum of understanding with PSFU, UIA, UMA and UIRI among others, which enable scholars and students to start contributing to development of projects.

The objective of the forum is to foster partnership with the public and private sectors for social-economic development. In doing so, Makerere is opening its doors to the public and private sectors for consultations, joint research and development and contribution to the training process of the graduate.

Bringing the appointees on board is expected to add value in that students that come out will be job creators not seekers thus reducing on the levels of unemployment.
